relates to a method of producing the thiol containing cross-linked fluid having moisture-absorption characteristics. A variety of methods of producing the thiol containing cross-linked fluid having moisture-absorption characteristics have been studied and proposed. For example, it has been proposed to mix a highly active material for cross-linking which is capable of cross-linking thiol groups into the fluid to be treated. However, the cross-linking must be completed at a relatively high temperature, but the method is not practical in some applications. In addition, when a highly active material is employed the fluid has an unpleasant odor. In addition, it has been proposed to employ a method of immersing a thiol containing substance in a liquid having a low vapor pressure and thereby forming a film of the substance, and cross-linking the film with thiol groups of the thiol containing substance. However, the cross-linking is completed by vaporization of the liquid, and thus a drying step is needed. In addition, the viscosity of the fluid rises and thus the fluid cannot be spread uniformly, the thickness of the film becomes non-uniform, and the fluid adsorbs the air. Also, the film-forming rate is low and the treatment for treatment of thiol groups by applying a material to the obtained film and maintaining a high temperature for a short period of time.
